The published interview of Ralph Greenson, in 1982, with Ellis Toney, one of the first African-American analysts, revealed he and other early African-American analysts were less fortunate than I. Greenson, a self-described "white liberal" who paved the way for the Los Angeles Psychoanalytic Society and Institute to admit Toney, its first African-American candidate (1948), later confessed that during his analysis of Toney, he became aware of his own unconscious racism.

The American Psychoanalyst

Abstract. Both historically and currently, assaults on the black body and mind have been ubiquitous in American society, posing a counterargument to America as a postracial, color-blind society. Yet the collective silence of psychoanalysts on this societal reality limits our ability to explore, teach, and treat the effects, both interpersonal and intrapsychic, of race, racism, racialized trauma, and implicit bias and privilege.
