Waste still existed. Certainly, we have historical evidence of this. A man named Francis Parkman observed the following scene and recorded it in his book The Oregon Trail published in 1849. At the time, Parkman and his companion are following the trail left by a village of Lakota in the area near Laramie Peak.

The narrator must seek to imbue himself with the life and spirit of the time. He must study events in their bearings near and remote; in the character, habits, and manners of those who took part in them. He must himself be, as it were, a sharer or a spectator of the action he describes." Francis Parkman
