This paper examines the root of unethical decisions by identifying the psychological forces that promote self-deception. Self-deception allows one to behave self-interestedly while, at the same time, falsely believing that one's moral principles were upheld. The end result of this internal con game is that the ethical aspects of the decision “fade” into the background, the moral ...

“ethical fading” to define the process by which the moral colors of an ethical decision fade into bleached hues that are void of moral implications. Our argument echoes Messick and Bazerman (1996) who argue that the assumption that executive ethics is based on explicit tradeoffs between ethics and profits is misplaced; rather, they argue, unethical behavior is due to the “psychological ...
